Answer Key

1. Answer would ideally include:

Powhatan and John Smith Meet: While Smith claimed that Chief Powhatan spared him his life because the chief's young daughter, Pocahontas, was in love with him and stood up for him, historians have a different understanding of what happened. The chief immediately executed the two other Englishmen who accompanied Smith but spared him and eventually released him. It is likely that before sending him back to Jamestown, Powhatan performed an adoption ceremony in an effort to bring Smith and the English under his authority. A typical ceremony would have involved him sending out one of his daughters to indicate that the captive was spared. Smith either refused this status or misunderstood the ceremony entirely.

2. Answer would ideally include:

Why English Established New England: The first colonists left England and came to North America for religious freedom, not commercial success or aims of conquest. These men and women settled New England in the 1620s and did not invite John Smith to join them. These settlers were known as Puritans, and they believed the Church of England was practicing a corrupt form of Christianity.

3. Answer would ideally include:

Role of Religion in North American Colonization: Both Protestant and Catholic leaders urged their followers to spread the faith to North America, while those who found themselves to be religious minorities went to the colonies for safety and freedom. Political struggles between Protestant and Catholic rulers in Europe inspired others to leave the area, as the politicization of religious divisions resulted in peasant unrest, economic crises, and military conflicts.

4. Answer would ideally include:

Abuse of Pueblo People: Franciscans converted twenty thousand Pueblos to Catholicism, destroyed Pueblo sacred shrines, and flogged Pueblo ceremonial leaders. They forced the Indians to adopt European ways, forbidding the women from farming the land and making the Indians speak, cook, and dress like Spaniards. They forced the Pueblos to work for them, building churches and supporting the mission, in violation of their own Spanish labor laws. Later, Juan de Onate established a trading post and with his 500 soldiers seized corn and clothing from Pueblo villages, murdering or raping those who resisted.

5. Answer would ideally include:

French and Indian "Exchange": Fur traders were critical to sustaining the French presence and warding off encroachment by the English. They journeyed along lakes and rivers throughout eastern Canada, some taking Indian wives who provided them with both domestic labor and kinship ties to powerful trading partners. These marriages helped forge a middle ground in the Great Lakes region as French traders pushed westward and gained new Indian allies among other tribes. Shared economic interest motivated a remarkable degree of cultural exchange and mutual adaptation.

6. Answer would ideally include:

Smith and Powhatan: Smith was dependent on Powhatan's tribe for survival for years. Powhatan was far more powerful than his English neighbors and kept them alive, hoping they would provide him with European cloth, iron hatchets, and even guns. Still, English settlers raided Indian villages for corn and other food and built a fort, alarming Powhatan and causing him to lose patience.

7. Answer would ideally include:

Shift from Servitude to Slavery: Several factors contributed to a shifting workforce during the seventeenth century. Tobacco reigned supreme as the most lucrative cash crop, and its expansion was inevitable. The demand for workers outpaced their availability. From 1650 onward, improved economic conditions in England meant fewer English men and women wanted to travel to North America. Unable to recruit volunteers, the legal system was changed to support slavery. Colonial leaders in the House of Burgesses in 1660 and in Maryland in 1664 passed acts that established greater control over African inhabitants and allowed for their enslavement. The groundwork was thereby laid for establishing the full-blown racial slavery that soon followed.

8. Answer would ideally include:

Puritans' Safe Haven in New England: As religious dissenters, the Puritans faced persecution in England. They believed their country's church and government were corrupt. They interpreted failed harvests, financial collapse, and the resultant poverty, famine, and homelessness as a sign of God's punishment for England's sins. They saw New England as a safe haven from God's wrath, "a refuge" from the "general destruction." They aimed to establish a prosperous, moral, and model "city upon a hill" that would inspire reform among those still in England.

9. Answer would ideally include:

Cultural Exchanges: French missionaries sought to build on native beliefs rather than destroy them and to learn native languages and customs and engage Indians on their own terms. French traders relied on Indian allies for help establishing trading partnerships and routes. Spanish explorers had no respect for Native American culture, rituals, or language. The Spanish sought to destroy indigenous Indian beliefs and mocked them at all opportunities. They felt less indebted to or dependent on positive relationships with Indians and were more likely to meet them with violence to get what they wanted.

10. Answer would ideally include:

Early Center of Commerce: New Amsterdam attracted traders, fishermen, and farmers. It was known for its representative government and religious toleration. Religious differences did not get in the way of making money. New Amsterdam was built to fend off French and English raids on ships by establishing a powerful Dutch presence in the middle of the North American colonies. The settlement was established by the Dutch West Indies Company, which was chartered only three years earlier, while the Dutch East India Company controlled trade routes to much of Asia and parts of Africa. These developments demonstrate the strength and ambitions of the Dutch empire.

11. Answer would ideally include:

Corruption: People were angry with the Roman Catholic Church for many reasons, including papal involvement in conflicts among monarchs, corruption among church officials, and widespread immorality, ignorance, and absenteeism among the clergy.

Martin Luther: Critics such as Martin Luther believed that faith alone led to salvation and that indulgences and other forms of mediation by priests and bishops between people and God were unnecessary. In 1517, Luther drafted an extended argument against indulgences, which were a source of profit for the Roman Catholic Church. Luther's teachings circulated widely, and his belief that people themselves should study Scripture and reflect on its significance was attractive to the literate middle class.

John Calvin: John Calvin emerged as another leader in this movement. He developed a form of Protestantism in which civil magistrates and reformed ministers ruled over a Christian society. According to Calvin, God was all-knowing and sovereign while man was weak and sinful. He advocated “predestination,” the idea that God decided at the beginning of time who was saved and who was damned. Human prayer, faith, or effort played no part in salvation.

Reformation: The Protestant Reformation spread throughout Central and Northern Europe. In countries like Spain and France—whose strong central governments had powerful ties to the Roman Catholic Church—a Catholic Counter-Reformation largely quashed Protestantism.

12. Answer would ideally include:

English Reliance on Native Americans: The English at first could barely survive the conditions, given the mosquitoes, scarcity of freshwater, and their inability to adapt to the climate and lifestyle. Native Americans fed the English for years. They also decided not to kill the English leader, John Smith, upon first encounter, though they did kill some of his men in establishing their authority and control of the region.

Cultural Differences: Miscommunication likely marked some earlier interactions. Smith believed that he was spared because of the love of the chief's young daughter, Pocahontas, while historians believe this was a gesture of peacemaking by the chief to state he wanted to work with Smith and possibly even adopt him into his tribe.

Raids: The English were neither organized nor armed enough in the early years to launch a full-scale attack on the Indians. This didn't stop the settlers from raiding Indian villages and stealing corn and supplies. Powhatan viewed this as a nuisance but not enough of an issue to declare war or cut off ties, as he still hoped to benefit from trade with the Europeans and receive cloth, iron, and other goods.

Tobacco Economy: After the successful cultivation of tobacco, relations were transformed. The English needed more land and laborers to grow their successful crops. Powhatan tried one last time to build an alliance by offering his daughter Pocahontas to marry John Rolfe. The English became more militant and aggressive toward the Indians. As the English settlements expanded, conflict and war continued until the Indians finally submitted to English authority in 1646.

13. Answer would ideally include:

Class Tensions: By the 1660s and 1670s, men and women who had begun as indentured servants and had earned their freedom found themselves an increasingly poor and unhappy group. Their dreams of riches were unrealized. Those who ventured west and claimed land were at constant war with the Indians. Virginia's governor neglected their complaints, instead prioritizing labor demands of wealthy planters and the economic ties of English merchants who traded with Indians. The governor established a fort system for some protection but charged taxes for it, further enraging the poor.

Conflict with Indians: A conflict erupted in 1675 between frontier settlers and Indian tribes long aligned with England. Violence was widespread. Retaliation followed, but the governor refused to send in troops. Nathaniel Bacon was a young Virginia newcomer who defied the governor's order and built an army to attack the region's Indians and defend English settlers. Other elites in conflict with the governor joined Bacon's rebellion along with laborers, black and white.

Virginia's Government Quells Class Conflict: The stand-down continued between Berkeley and Bacon. Bacon attacked Jamestown, and Berkeley charged Bacon with treason and working to undermine the governor. Berkeley fled as Bacon seized the governor's estate. Shortly thereafter, however, Bacon died, and the movement came undone. The governor reclaimed his authority and hanged 23 rebel leaders. The new elites realized the power and potential of an alliance between the aggrieved laborers, black and white, and sought to destroy any future solidarity between the groups. Virginia legislators began to improve the conditions of poor whites and place new restrictions on poor blacks.

Puritan Beliefs: Puritans set out to establish a simpler form of worship from that practiced in the Anglican Church. They focused on their inner lives and the purity of their church and community. They believed in an all-knowing God whose true word was presented in the Bible. Only a few people received God's grace; they hoped their churches were filled with saints. Salvation was predetermined and known only by God. A godly life was a sign that one was chosen. Like most Christians at the time, they believed signs of God's hand in the world were everywhere, including in natural phenomena like comets, eclipses, and birth defects. They viewed a smallpox epidemic that decimated Indians as a sign of God's approval.

Religion in the Community: Religious beliefs inspired a strong community, as faith guided civil and spiritual decisions. Ministers often served as ministers of the General Court; the church was the state. Puritan leadership and authority was generally accepted, but dissenters made themselves heard as well. Puritan leaders admonished dissenters such as Roger Williams and Anne Hutchinson, who were forced out of the colony and settled in Rhode Island, a place increasingly known for its tolerance and diversity.

Causes of War: By 1670, Native American tribes in New England were decimated, with only 15,000 or so people surviving. Meanwhile, English settlements grew dramatically, soaring to over 50,000 and expanding regularly, encroaching on native hunting grounds. The English initiated conflicts with the Wampanoags, their longtime allies, insisting they surrender their guns and succumb to English law. Resisting, the Indians fought back, raided farms, and killed settlers.

Who Was Involved: By 1675, Wampanoag chief Metacom, called King Philip by the English, decided the only chance of survival for the Indians was to force the English out of New England. He rallied support from neighboring Narragansett and Nipmuck Indians and attacked white settlements throughout the area.

Outcome: The battles dragged on, killing 1,000 English settlers, destroying 1,200 homes, and slaughtering 8,000 cattle. Metacom's forces went on to attack Plymouth and Providence. The English, meanwhile, forged an alliance with Mohawks, Pequots, Mohegans, and praying Indians and ambushed Narragansett forces. Indian losses were catastrophic on both sides, as the English killed many of them and sold many more into slavery in the West Indies. Known as King Philip's War, it ended when the Mohawks ambushed and killed Metacom, and the Wampanoag, Narragansett, and Nipmuck forces ran out of guns and powder.
