SHORT ANSWER

169. The answer should be written in complete sentences and paragraphs. The categories of information that should be discussed include name, address, telephone number, e-mail address and other contact information if applicable, employment objective, education, employment history, legal work experience, related work experience, professional affiliations and memberships, and selected accomplishments.
170. A cover letter should point out things about the applicant and his or her qualifications for the position that might persuade a recruiter to examine his or her résumé. Some items to include are high academic standing at school (if applicable), eagerness to specialize in the same area of law as the position that is available, and willingness to relocate to the employer's location. The applicant's job is to convince the recruiter that he or she is a close match to the perfect candidate for the job. The applicant should also include information so that the reader knows when and where he or she can be reached.
171. The materials that are needed for the job application process are:
- Résumé—A document that summarizes the applicant's employment and educational background.
 - Cover letter—A letter that accompanies the résumé used when contacting an employer.
 - Professional references—A list of people whom the firm can contact to obtain information about the applicant's abilities.
 - Letters of recommendation—Letters written by previous employers or instructors recommending the applicant for a position.
 - Writing samples—Samples of written legal documents prepared by the applicant, either in school or at work.
 - Transcripts—A list of courses and grades from the applicant's college or university and paralegal education program.
 - Other relevant professional information—Professional certification or achievement documents.
172. Student answers might include the following:
- Small law firms:
- Advantages—Exposure to a greater variety of substantive legal areas; personal atmosphere and less formal environment; greater variety of tasks; greater flexibility of hours/procedures
 - Disadvantages—Less potential for advancement; lower salaries and fewer benefits; less support staff; possibly less access to computers; billable hours required

Large law firms:

- Advantages—Greater opportunities for promotions and career advancement; higher salaries and better benefits packages; more support staff for paralegals; more computer technology; greater access to research sources
- Disadvantages—Highly specialized work; less variety of tasks; formal atmosphere; billable hours required

Corporations:

- Advantages—More regular hours; less stress; no billable hours required; higher salaries than those for paralegals who work for law firms
- Disadvantages—Specialized work; formal atmosphere; administrative work

Government agencies:

- Advantages—Regular working hours; more vacation time; no billable hours; extensive employment benefits
- Disadvantages—Lower average salaries than in law firms and corporations; specialized work; administrative work

Legal aid offices:

- Advantages—Personal satisfaction in providing legal services to those in need; wide array of responsibilities
- Disadvantages—Lower salaries than in other settings

173. Student answers might include the following:

- Litigation—Paralegals who specialize in litigation assistance work with litigation (trial) attorneys. Litigation paralegals work for all sizes and types of practices. They usually specialize in a certain type of litigation, such as personal injury, product liability, or specifically working on behalf of plaintiffs or defendants.
- Corporate law—Paralegals who specialize in corporate law may work for a corporation, in its legal department, or for a law firm that specializes in corporate law. Tasks performed by corporate law paralegals include preparing documents and filing them with the appropriate state agency to incorporate a new business, keeping corporate records, and organizing shareholders' meetings.
- Contract law—Paralegals who specialize in this area may work for a corporation's legal department, for a large law firm, or for a government agency. Their tasks may include preparing contracts, reviewing contract terms related to compliance or breach, and researching the law governing contracts.
- Real estate law—Paralegals who specialize in real estate work for a variety of employers, including small law firms, real estate departments in large law firms, corporations or other firms that buy or sell real property, and banks. Some of the tasks that they perform include drafting contracts for the sale of real estate, drafting mortgage agreements, drafting and recording deeds, and scheduling closings.
- Personal-injury law—Legal assistants who work in personal-injury law work in litigation. They tend to specialize in negligence cases that have resulted in personal injury to the client, such as auto accidents. They may also work for insurance companies investigating claims.
- Insurance law—Paralegals working in this area may work for law firms that defend insurance companies in litigation or they may work directly for insurance companies. Their tasks may include monitoring compliance with government insurance regulations, reviewing insurance contracts, investigating claims, and assisting in litigation. Insurance also is often an important factor for clients involved in personal-injury, malpractice, and other litigation.

- Employment and labor law—Paralegals who work in employment and labor law may work for law firms, businesses, or government agencies. Often paralegals specialize in just one of the many areas of employment law, such as workers' compensation, employment discrimination, wrongful termination, pension plans, or retirement and disability income. Paralegals who work in employment and labor law may also work with various administrative agencies, including workers' compensation boards.
 - Estate planning and probate administration—Paralegals who specialize in this area assist with tasks such as drafting wills and documents required to set up trusts, probating estates, gathering information relating to debts and assets of the deceased, or locating heirs.
 - Bankruptcy law—Paralegals who work in bankruptcy law may work in large or small firms. They assist entities with the bankruptcy process, a detailed process governed by federal law.
 - Intellectual property law—Paralegals working in this area may work for law firms or in corporate legal departments. The type of work in which they may be involved includes registering copyrights, patents, or trademarks with the federal government and other activities relating to registration.
 - Environmental law—Paralegals specializing in environmental law work for government agencies, state agencies, large law firms, environmental law firms, and corporations. They perform a variety of tasks, from compliance work to litigation.
 - Family law—Paralegals specializing in family law could work for a small family law practitioner, a family law department in a large firm, or a state or local agency that assists people with family-related problems. Tasks that are performed by family law paralegals include interviewing clients, researching the law, and preparing documents to be filed with the court.
 - Criminal law—Paralegals who specialize in criminal law may work for public prosecutors, public defenders, or criminal defense attorneys. Criminal litigation is similar to civil litigation in many respects, and the kinds of work performed by litigation paralegals also apply in the criminal law context.
174. Student answers might include the following:
- PROS: E-mail is faster than regular mail or express delivery services and can be immediately available to the firm.
 - CONS: E-mail résumés do not look as nice as hard-copy résumés, and some firms are not used to receiving submissions via e-mail. Attorneys generally prefer traditional résumés. If an advertisement lists an e-mail address, it is best to submit the application via e-mail and follow up with a printed copy of the letter and résumé as well.
175. The main components of paralegal compensation are salary (which may include bonus or overtime pay) and benefits (which may include paid holidays; sick leave; group insurance coverage for medical, dental, life, and disability insurance; pension plans; and other benefits). Paralegal compensation is affected by a number of factors, including the size of the firm or legal department and the specialty area in which the paralegal practices. Another income-determining factor is the paralegal's years of experience. Typically, more experienced paralegals enjoy higher rates of compensation. This is particularly noticeable when a paralegal has worked for the same employer for a long period of time. Another major factor that affects paralegal compensation is geographic location. Currently, paralegals who work in the West enjoy higher levels of compensation than paralegals in other regions of the country. However, salary figures represent averages and can therefore be deceptive. For example, a paralegal working in a rural area of Washington State may not earn as much as a paralegal who works in Chicago. Also, salary statistics do not tell the whole story. Although paralegals earn more in California than in Nebraska, the cost of living is higher in California than in Nebraska. This means that a paralegal's real income—the amount that can be purchased with a particular salary—may, in fact, be the same in both states despite the differences in salary.

176. Most law firms use a variety of software applications, including computerized billing programs, e-mail, calendaring software, and legal research applications. To be competitive in the job market, paralegals should be skilled at using these programs. For example, paralegals are often responsible for keeping track of the deadlines for filing court documents, along with court filing fees and requirements. Local court rules specify the filing dates and fees for different kinds of cases, but these rules change regularly. Failure to submit documents by the due date can result in a court's dismissing the case or the client's dismissing the firm. Moreover, missed deadlines are a leading cause of malpractice (professional negligence) lawsuits filed by clients against attorneys. Many firms have computerized calendaring software to help ensure that attorneys do not miss important dates and to calculate required fees based on the local court rules. Such software could suit the needs of a small law firm that handles only local cases, but it might not be adequate if the firm handles cases in numerous counties or states. Rather than buying a more comprehensive and expensive calendaring program and incurring the costs of installation and training, the firm could use an online calendaring service. A paralegal who knows about the availability of online calendaring applications could suggest that the firm use these services on a pay-per-use basis, which could save the firm time and funds. The paralegal might gain the respect and appreciation of the firm and might be asked for his or her input regarding future technology decisions.
177. Career opportunities often go unpublished. Many firms post notices within their own organizations before publishing them online or in the "Help Wanted" section of a newspaper or periodical. If a paralegal has connections within an organization, he or she may be told that a position is opening up before other candidates are aware that an opportunity exists. More paralegals find employment through networking than through any other means. For paralegals, networking is the process of making personal connections with other paralegals, paralegal instructors, attorneys, and others who are involved in (or who know someone who is involved in) the paralegal or legal profession. Online networking is becoming popular as well. Professional organizations and student internships also offer important networking opportunities.
178. You can do many things prior to the interview to improve your chances of getting the job. First, do your "homework." Learn as much about the employer as possible. Check with your instructors or other legal professionals to find out if they are familiar with the firm or the interviewer. Check the employer's website, if there is one, and consult relevant directories, such as legal and company directories, as well as business publications. When you are called for an interview, learn the full name of the interviewer, so that you will be able to address him or her by name during the interview and properly address a follow-up letter. During the interview, use Mr. or Ms. in addressing the interviewer unless directed by the interviewer to be less formal. Anticipate and review the questions that you might be asked during the interview. Then prepare (and possibly rehearse with a friend) your answers to these questions. Be prepared to be interviewed by a "team" of legal professionals, such as an attorney, a paralegal, and perhaps others from the firm. Promptness is extremely important. Plan to arrive for the interview at least ten minutes early, and allow plenty of extra time to get there. If the firm is located in an area that is unfamiliar to you, make sure that you know how to get there, how long it will take, and, if you are driving, whether parking is available nearby. Appearance is also important. Wear a relatively conservative suit or dress to the interview, and limit your use of jewelry or other accents. You can find further tips on how to prepare for a job interview by checking online career sites or by looking at books dealing with careers and job hunting.

179. To stay on top of job-search activities, the job applicant needs to construct a filing system. This is done by creating a separate file for each potential employer, and keeping copies of all letters, including e-mail messages, to that employer in the file, along with any responses. The applicant might also want to keep lists or notes with addresses, telephone numbers, e-mail addresses, dates of contacts, advantages and disadvantages of employment with the various firms that the applicant contacted or by which the applicant was interviewed, topics discussed at interviews, and the like. Then, when called for an interview, the applicant will have information on the firm at his or her fingertips. Always keep in mind that when looking for paralegal employment, the applicant's "job" is finding work as a paralegal—and it pays to be efficient. The applicant's files will also provide an excellent resource for networking even after he or she has a permanent position. The files may also provide useful information for a career change in the future.
